I feel that the BBC reacts to our different racial/sexual communities inappropriately. Looking at the UK as a whole, there will be statistical proportions of each group which is what I believe the BBC reflects. However, in the real world, this mix is rarely seen outside one or two large cities. In all other areas there will usually be very strong representation of just one or two racial groups and different levels of openness regarding minority sexual groups. This is even more pronounced in rural areas. The end result is that the majority of geographical areas of the UK rarely, if ever, see a BBC TV show that truly reflects the area in which the viewer lives.
